Public schools should continue with the multiple ways that parents have of accessing teaching plans already, including talking with teachers, back-to-school nights, and online classroom portals – new calls for transparency are more about politics than what's best for the children.	49%	49%	50%	58%	49%	55%	46%	56%	56%	51%	48%
Public schools should post all lesson plans and teaching materials online for greater parent transparency – this gives parents more control over what their children learn and allows them to pull their children out of lessons they disagree with, or think are inappropriate.	39%	38%	38%	30%	39%	33%	38%	35%	34%	38%	40%

Government should be more transparent and create an accessible database where the amount of money spent to educate every student in every school can be seen by parents and the public, and cross-referenced by race, household income, and performance metrics.	45%	53%	46%	58%	44%	39%	39%	41%	41%	42%	44%
Government's emphasis on funding misses the point because more money doesn't always mean better schools. Do you support or oppose changing the way that public education is funded in your state – the likely effect would be that districts serving poor students and students of color would receive more funding while mostly white students from wealthier parts of the state would receive less.

88. Advocates of school choice say that too many schools are underperforming, and families deserve to have the freedom to choose the educational environment that serves their children best, regardless of financial ability or home address.

Opponents of school choice say that it can go too far by taking money and students from the public school system and undermines the value of public education by allowing tax money to be used for private, religious, and home schooling.

91. Charter schools are independently run public schools funded by local taxes that allow more flexibility and innovation on things like curriculum and administration. They share their best practices with district schools – and the states in which they operate hold them to academic standards. If a charter school receives more applications than they have open seats, they must accept students based on a lottery.

Methodology

The survey, which was conducted online, carries a 95 percent credibility level of +/-2.9 percentage points for the national sample of registered voters. Post-stratification weights were calculated for this survey. Weights were calculated based on the 2020 and 2021 Current Population Survey. The survey consists of a national sample of 1,075 registered voters and between 481 and 626 registered voters in 10 focus jurisdictions: California, Colorado, The District of Columbia, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Missouri, New Jersey, Tennessee and Texas. A total of 6,565 registered voters completed the survey. Gender, age, race and ethnicity, educational attainment, marital status, and census division were used for weighting. Separate weights were calculated for the national sample and for each jurisdiction. Additionally, non-coverage bias factors associated with online behaviors were used to adjust the sample, including tablet ownership, trust in neighbors, and participation in civic activities. Among registered voters, respondents had a mean weight of 1.07, a median weight of .95 and a standard deviation of .92.
